

Everything you need to know about the “Right to be forgotten”

GDPR

Also known as the right to erasure, the GDPR gives individuals the right to ask organizations to delete their personal data. But organizations don't always have to do it. Here we explain when the right to be forgotten applies and when it doesn't.

The General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) governs how personal data must be collected, processed, and erased. The “right to be forgotten,” which received a lot of press after the 2014 judgment from the EU Court of Justice, set the precedent for the right of erasure provision contained in the GDPR. Of course, given competing interests and the hyper-connected nature of the Internet, the right to be forgotten is much more complicated than an individual simply requesting that an organization erase their personal data. This article takes a closer look at when people can make a right to be forgotten request, the value it adds for EU residents, and how organizations can create a right to be forgotten form to ensure GDPR compliance.

What is the right to be forgotten?

The right to be forgotten appears in Recitals 65 and 66 and in Article 17 of the GDPR. It states, “The data subject shall have the right to obtain from the controller the erasure of personal data concerning him or her without undue delay and the controller shall have the obligation to erase personal data without undue delay” if one of a number of conditions applies. “Undue delay” is considered to be about a month. You must also take reasonable steps to verify the person requesting erasure is actually the data subject.

The right to be forgotten dovetails with people's right to access their personal information in Article 15. The right to control one's data is meaningless if people cannot take action when they no longer consent to processing, when there are significant errors within the data, or if they believe information is being stored unnecessarily. In these cases, an individual can request that the data be erased. But this is not an absolute right. If it were, the critics who argue that the right to be forgotten amounts to nothing more than a rewriting of history would be correct. Thus, the GDPR walks a fine line on data erasure.

When does the right to be forgotten apply?

In Article 17, the GDPR outlines the specific circumstances under which the right to be forgotten applies. An individual can request that an organization have their personal data erased if:

- The personal data is no longer necessary for the purpose an organization originally collected or processed the data for
- An organization is relying on an individual's consent as the lawful basis for processing the data and the individual has withdrawn their consent.
- An organization is relying on legitimate interests as its justification for processing an individual's data and there is no overriding legitimate interest for the organization to continue with this processing.
- An organization is processing personal data for direct marketing purposes and the individual objects to the processing.
- An organization processed an individual's personal data unlawfully.
- An organization must erase personal data in order to comply with a legal ruling or obligation.

- The data being processed is necessary for public health purposes and serves in the public interest.
- The data being processed is necessary to perform preventative or occupational medicine. This only applies when the data is being processed by a health professional who is subject to a legal obligation of professional secrecy.
- The data represents important information that serves the public interest, scientific research, historical research, or statistical purposes and where erasure of the data would likely to impair or halt progress towards the achievement that was the goal of the processing.
- The data is being used for the establishment of a legal defense or in the exercise of other legal claims.

Furthermore, an organization can request a “reasonable fee” or deny a request to erase personal data if the organization can justify that the request was unfounded or excessive.

As you can see, there are many variables at play and each request will have to be evaluated individually. Add to that the technical burden of keeping track of all the places an individual's personal data is stored or processed and it is easy to see why the GDPR's new privacy rights can be a significant compliance burden for some organizations.

Right to be forgotten request template

The GDPR does not specify what a valid request to erasure entails. An individual can make a request for erasure verbally or in writing. This request can also be made to any member of your organization, not just to a designated contact. As long as a request meets the conditions above, it is valid, even if it does not refer to “Request for Erasure” the “Right to be Forgotten,” Article 17, or the GDPR.

This can create a challenge for an organization as any employee could receive a valid verbal request. Below is a sample “Right to Erasure” request form that could help you streamline the process. Note that this is just a template and can be modified to suit your organization's needs.
